COLUMBIA, TENNESSEE, JULY 14, 1871.

PERFECTLY HEARTLESS.
"Pretty" is, rather pretty, but perfectly heartless!" said old Mrs. Holmes to Dr. Stanley, with whom she was conversing at a large brilliant party.

"Heartless!" with that sensitive mouth, and those eyes so full of expression," said the gentleman, musingly.

"I don't admire her style of beauty at all. She looks like a wax doll, and her heartlessness is proverbial. Since she left her so wealthy, she has had lovers by the score, and she flirts with every one. Why, look at her now!"

Dr. Stanley's eyes followed the direction in which the lady waved her hand, and he looked at the figure of a young man who was standing near the door. It was a lady young and fair, with a tall, exceedingly graceful figure, pure Greek features, and large blue eyes. Her hair was short, but the soft full curls made a lovely frame for the face.

"Her dress was of a dark blue, ornamented with diamonds and dark green leaves. She was conversing quietly with a knot of gentlemen, and Dr. Stanley mused over the group.

"Miss Marston," said one gentleman, "has just become of Harold Graham?"

Her hand swept over the ivory keys of the grand piano, in the measure of a brilliant waltz, when something of the group, supposing that Miss Marston did not hear the question, said:

"Perhaps he has committed suicide."

"It is three weeks since he disappeared," said another.

"I want his tutor for our next musical score. It would be too puzzling for him to compose such a piece," said Dr. Stanley.

"Mrs. Holmes was right," thought Dr. Stanley, "she is perfectly heartless."

He turned from the piano, and stopped at the full, rich voice broke out into a song. Miss Marston was singing sweetly and deeply, and into the mournful words she poured such wailing energy and deep pathos, that the group of gentlemen and ladies ceased their conversation to listen to the music.

"Can she sing so without heart or feeling?" mused the doctor, again drawing nearer to the place.

"Ella," said a young lady, as the last refrain faded away, "Ella, do play a waltz now."

A cadentissimo music quivered for a moment, and then, as if by magic, then playing more natively, she dashed off into a lively polka which soon melted the group round the piano into a merry throng, and Dr. Stanley with the rest.

The next morning Miss Marston sat in her room, and she looked over her shoulder at one sentence: "All follow and heartless! Miriam, you know me for thirty years, and yet you do not love me, and you do not care for my money. Not one true heart amongst all of them. There was none!"

A knock at the door interrupted her.

"Come in!" and a woman entered with a large basket of washing.

"Good morning," said Ella, pleasantly, "What is the matter, my dear?"

"I must observe to your majesty," said Napoleon, gruffly, "that it is I who give, and you only who must receive."

The king was present, silent and dejected at the sight of his wife's unwelcome and lowly visitor.

As soon as the Queen retired, Napoleon sent for Talleyrand and the Russian Minister, and concluded the treaty of the peace of Paris.

"After all," he said, "a woman and gallantry are not to be weighed against states."

At the close of the day, Napoleon was conducting her down the stairs, the Queen passed, and pressing the Emperor's hand as he bowed, she said, "I have been so long waiting for you, and I have been so long waiting for you."

"What I gave Terrence has nothing to do with my life," said Ella, rapidly bounding up the stairs.

"Miss Ella," said Mary, and then she stopped.

"Sure, Miss, you do much good with your money, I am ashamed to tell you."

"Well, Miss, it's about the young man that's ruined my room. You mind the little fellow, and you mind the little fellow, and you mind the little fellow."

"What I gave Terrence has nothing to do with my life," said Ella, rapidly bounding up the stairs.

"Miss Ella," said Mary, and then she stopped.
